JOSHUA KRYAH

Neverbody

Unsaid, but that the hand makes it known, a gesture not yet clear, but veering close, close.

And what else should speak for you then?

The sparrow caught in the soot-limed chimney, its wings thrashing and thrashing and thrashing—

What revealed then, what rent?

Bone, ivory, dentin—the body's bright Braille to sift through as harbinger, herald, or messenger—each a sign almost certain to assemble an architecture worthy of worship, but that your livid offering, again enlivened, its parts quickening to pronounce a way back, should want only to linger or bide or persist, uninterrupted, in this, its marrow-house.
